To Make a Home Out of a Household.

Hospitality and the giving of ceremonial entertainments are by no means synonymous. A dinner party is no essential element in that easy and gracious hospitality which is the highest charm of the home life. "The ornaments of a home are the friends who frequentit," said Emerson. The pleasure of social intercourse is so largely in the unforesend ripoping in of a friend on those occasions when one does not provide entertainment, but merely shares the resources of the hour, whatever they may chance to be. It is not so much what we offer a guest, as the spirit in which it is offered. The dinner "where love is," however simple it may be, is proverband to the summer of the control of the country, the five o'clock tea in the city serves admirably, and the custom is too near meeting a demand of sincere life to be ever wholly banished in the city serves admirably, and the custom is too near meeting a demand of sincere life to be ever wholly banished by any caprice of fashion. The best we can give a friend is the sweet intimacy of home life, the ready welcome, the re-sponse of sympathy and interest. This is that true hospitality, for which mere ecremonial observances, while they have their place and no unimportant one in life, yet offer no adequate substitute.— Ex.

On the Side of the Minister

On the Side of the Minister.

Billy Sterrette's new paper, "The Girl," published at Cloverport, has risaled sand; in a mention of an "alleged altercation" between a minister and a young lady temperance lecturer.
From what we gather from another report, in a staid old paper, the BrackesBIRGE NEWS, we are on the side of the minister. The mission of woman is nobler and purer than the lecture field.
She trespasses upon the minister's donobler and purer than the becture field.

She trespasses upon the minister's domains and field of usefulness when she champions the special cause of temperance, just the same as a minister does when he digresses and enters the arena of politics and becomes a candidate for county, State or national office. We venture the minister in question, the specch. Hodding the pulp has a smooth field, he will content himself with spreading the goopel according to the good old Baptist doctrine.—Union Local.
